Narrative to replace “Eggs of Plenty” paragraph on “Certified Copy” Page

After visiting friends in the southeast Moroccan village of Hassilabied five times over the past two-and-a-half years, I devised with them an innovative and entrepreneurial plan to address the chronic malnutrition and poverty among the nomads in and around the village.

Situated at the bottom of the Erg Chebbi (one of Morocco’s two sea-like expanses of huge sand dunes), Hassilabied was founded by 50 formerly nomadic families. The village is the nearest resource for many families still living the millennia-old goat and camel herding way of life. These nomadic women live in stick structure “homesteads” near the dunes with their children while the men are away with their herds for extended periods. Their diet is poor. The nearest well is three miles away. They have no means of making money other than occasional donations from tourists. And, most of all, they have no means to better their situation.

Our plan was to initiate the first ever egg-laying hen farm in Hassilabied and gradually teach the nomadic women how to care for hens on their own homesteads. (The idea came from board member Abraham Elibrahimi who previously established a successful chicken farm in Khemisset, Morocco.) Acreage and caretaking was secured for the first 150 hens in October of 2014. Roosters to replace and grow the flock have been procured. A plan for recycling the food waste of the village riads (hotels and restaurants) for chicken feed and composting was devised. An organizer and coordinator between the co-op and the nomad women is in place. Now the first 20 women from the dunes are being invited to adopt chickens for their homesteads and participate in this co-operative on an ongoing basis. The benefits are many for the nomads and villagers alike:

- Participating families will have a daily supply of eggs for their own protein needs, for trade or for sale back to the co-op or to others.
- The co-op can buy eggs from the women and have a market supply for villagers.
- The food waste gathered from the riads reduces waste in the village and is completely recycled as either chicken feed or compost.
- The feed and compost are a free resource to the nomads for their chickens and gardens.
- Nourished by the nitrogen-rich chicken manure compost, an organic garden is now growing adjacent to the chicken coops, another resource for the nomads for produce, compost, seeds and starter plants.
- All of these activities provide the beginnings of an agricultural education for the adults and children involved—a way to empower and improve their lives without abandoning their age-old customs and culture.
