14. The second, third and fourth steps of the "three-step" methodology, i.e., the identification, the selection and the comparison of the relevant data, are the most important and difficult steps in the methodology. The identification of the relevant data is the most important step in the methodology. It is the identification of the relevant data that determines the scope of the study and the results of the study. The selection of the relevant data is the second most important step in the methodology. It is the selection of the relevant data that determines the quality of the study and the results of the study. The comparison of the relevant data is the third most important step in the methodology. It is the comparison of the relevant data that determines the validity of the study and the results of the study.
