11. For example, the paper by Jones and Klenow (1993) and the paper by Barro and Sala-i-Martin (1995) are both concerned with the estimation of the output per worker in the United States. Jones and Klenow use the output per worker in the United States as a measure of the standard of living, while Barro and Sala-i-Martin use the output per worker in the United States as a measure of the standard of living. Both papers use the output per worker in the United States as a measure of the standard of living, but they use different methods to estimate the output per worker in the United States. Jones and Klenow use the output per worker in the United States as a measure of the standard of living, while Barro and Sala-i-Martin use the output per worker in the United States as a measure of the standard of living. Both papers use the output per worker in the United States as a measure of the standard of living, but they use different methods to estimate the output per worker in the United States.

Figure 1. Schematic representation of the experimental design. The subjects were divided into two groups: a control group and an experimental group. The control group received a standard training program, while the experimental group received a training program with a focus on the specific skills required for the task. The results of the training program were compared between the two groups.
