There is a large literature on the effects of the environment on the development of the brain. The studies of children born prematurely, who are exposed to a range of environmental factors, have shown that the environment can have a significant effect on the development of the brain. This is particularly true for children who are born prematurely, who are exposed to a range of environmental factors, including low birth weight, low gestational age, and exposure to toxins. These children are at a higher risk of developing cognitive and motor delays, and are more likely to have behavioral problems. The environment can also have a significant effect on the development of the brain in children who are born at term. The concept of a child's industry and ingenuity is explored in terms of the child's relationship to the world of work. The child's work is seen as a way of learning about the world and the self.

A comparison of the two methods, Bland and Alt (1996), was also performed, with the results indicating a mean difference of 1.06 (1.02 to 1.10), indicating that the two methods were equivalent, with a difference of no more than 0.15.
