So what did Picasso mean when he said that, "Good artists copy and great artists steal?" In a perfect world, we would all be special, unique and irreplaceable. But it's basically common knowledge that everything we do today, has already been done over and over before. But then what defines art? What is creativity? Does originality still exist? Picasso was onto something that rings true to anyone who has ever created anything of their "own." And this could be easily understood: A good artist will have just enough talent to replicate an idea that has already been expressed, without interjecting, without transforming or manner which indelibly leaves his own impression behind. The kind that has no carbon copy. When you hear something you like, see some thing that catches your eye, add a hint of yourself before claiming it your own. No explanations need to be given. The idea doesn't have to progress, but therein lies the beauty of a great artist. The beauty of being able to take something that never belonged to you, running away with it, and ultimately calling it yours. Something that can never be done when copying, for if you don't duplicate the idea you are initiating exactly the way it was originally produced, then, you
